

Andrew J. Lippert retired from the U.S. Army after 26 years of service in assignments throughout the world. He is currently the academic executive officer for the Department of Command, Leadership, and Management at the U.S. Army War College.

Prior to this, Lippert held a variety of positions, which include the following: senior analyst at the Center for Strategic Leadership, U.S. Army War College; professor of strategic leadership and enterprise management, U.S. Army War College; executive advisor to the commander of the NATO Air Training Command and senior air advisor to the Ministry of the Interior in Kabul, Afghanistan; commander of 3rd Battalion, 2nd Aviation Regiment, which provided aviation support in South Korea, Japan, and the Philippines; director of aviation sustainment training at the U.S. Army Aviation Logistics School; assistant operations officer for an aviation research and development directorate; executive officer of a flight school training battalion; and chief of plans and operations at the Air Maneuver Battle Lab, which tested aviation concepts through constructive and virtual simulations. Prior to these assignments, Lippert served in leadership and staff positions of progressively greater responsibility at the tactical and operational levels.

In addition to his career in the military, Lippert is a member of Rotary Club of Carlisle (Sunrise Chapter), the Carlisle Chamber of Commerce, and serves on the Board of Directors for Carlisle C.A.R.E.S.

Lippert holds a P.h.D. in History from Temple University, a Master of Strategic Studies from the U.S. Army War College, a Master of Science in Administration from Central Michigan University, and a Bachelor of Science from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point.
